Save The Waves' All Points South Wins Best Short Film at New York Surf Film Festival

September 28, 2009. New York City, NY – Save The Waves Coalition and the New York Surf Film Festival are proud to announce that Save The Waves' documentary film, All Points South, has been awarded Best Short Film by the festival jury. The surfer-activist film, about pulp pollution, surfers, and fishermen in Chile, was chosen as best short from a field of over 15 films in the short films program.

New York Surf Film Festival co-founder Tyler Breuer announced the award to a packed audience gathered at the awards ceremony in lower Manhattan on Sunday night. "This short film is an emotional and compelling story with great surfing, and it completely deserves the award. It was an overwhelmingly strong decision by our 12-member jury panel to award the prize to All Points South."

Save The Waves environmental director Josh Berry, who wrote and co-produced the film, was in New York to accept the award. "We took very serious risks to expose this ocean pollution drama in Chile, so it's a great reward for the hard work put in by everyone involved in the film. The story of All Points South is not over yet and the people of Chile are the true stars of this ongoing chronicle."

Said film director Sachi Cunningham, "We're thrilled with the recognition and hope that it inspires surfers everywhere who are concerned about the environment to not only think globally about our oceans' health, but also act locally to keep their breaks clean."
